Welcome once again to the new academic year 2022 - 2023!

After 2 years of learning from home, it is refreshing to see almost everyone going back to the pre-pandemic groove of learning. While there are challenges to face, it is important that we maintain the optimism that things will get better and that students will soon ease themselves into face to face learning routines and expectations. Some may find it easy to adjust but others may take a longer time. There will be definitely big adjustments to make, maybe twice as hard as when we went from physical to online classes

During our first day's orientation, we have discussed with our students that these might be the challenges they will be facing:

(i) Students might have forgotten most of the offline school routines such as coming to school on time (by waking up earlier and preparing their things and eating their breakfast), donning their school uniform, being properly groomed or going to toilet only at appropriate times. Teachers need to re-establish them again to become part of their system.

(ii) For some students, they may find it weird or strange to be back to school, especially the very introverted ones who got used to being on their own and not really interacting with anyone for almost two years and found consolation and comfort in not having to adjust to any social interactions. It will now become a challenge for them to again start socialising and learn the art of communicating with their peers.

(iii) As the teachers will suddenly seize control of their classrooms and their lessons, some students who have hidden behind their cameras and feigned attentiveness for the longest time might find it daunting to focus and will feel the pressure of being watched and monitored continuously. The idea that students will now be fully supervised for all assignments and works, may present some struggles for students such as finishing their work on time or submitting hastily done pieces of work.

(iv) A big number of students' study habits and skills might have been impacted negatively during HBL. We have observed, especially after over a year the anxiety caused by HBL. Some students started becoming disengaged and they find it laborious to be in Zoom classrooms. Good study habits that have been developed pre-pandemic might have been exchanged with unfavourable habits that made students who used to do well underperform. Teachers will play a big role to help students re-acquire these good habits or develop better ones for them to learn purposefully again.

(v) Following up on part (iii) and (iv), some students, may suddenly find it hard to suddenly focus and may not know how to manage the idea that they are now being seen by teachers physically. During HBL, students can easily conceal their inattentiveness and disengagement during HBL because they have the power to mute or unmute and turn their videos off. Some students might not have the stamina to be in an hour or two hours of continuous class and might show obvious signs while in the classroom such as sitting on a slump position or even probably dozing off during lessons.

(vi) While the messaging is that we are now trying to be as normal as we can, it is not really close to being "normal". There are many limitations caused by observing health and safety protocols. It will continue to be reinforced as part of the school culture to wear are masks at all times (except when eating and drinking), conversations will still be kept to minimum and when it is really necessary, sanitisation of hands regularly will be encouraged and mass gathering will be avoided as much as possible.

For students, seeing their friends in school would mean that they have to talk, touch and interact with them so this can become a let-down for them.

(vii) While relying on technology tide us over the challenges of learning during pandemic, being back in school would entail that students have to now be weaned off from their gadgets as their use might now be more limited. Those who found the greatest advantage in doing everything using their computers or other electronic gadgets may find it discomforting to not be able to touch them for a while during lessons.

These are not exhaustive list of the challenges brought about by this transition but they are not to be ignored as they can impact the learning experiences of the students. As we navigate this post-pandemic era, while the threat has not been fully extinguished, the role that our teachers play are crucial, and with the continued support coming from our parents, we will be able to tide through these challenges once again.

For our students, there is nothing difficult if the learning environment is supportive, especially if it addresses their health and psychosocial well-being and other needs. We at NHJS will strive not only to help them recover lost instructional time and get them back on track but over time, but will address issues that have developed due to the prolonged HBL and the issues of transitioning back to offline learning.
